in Aeolian Hall.

The fifth evening concert of the New Symphony Society took place at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme embraced three numbers, the E minor symphony of Brahms, Henry Hadley's tone poem, "Salome," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. This reads like a short programme, but it required the usual time in performance.

Mr. Hadley's composition occupied a good—half hour, according to the hearer's point of view. But generally speaking no audience will listen patiently to any instrumental work consuming thirty minutes without pause. Occasional intervals for rest and refreshment are just as important to the hearing of music as to Bunthorne's scheme of existence.

Mr. Hadley conducted his own music. He has had abundant experience as a conductor and he obtained results generally good. But his composition is somewhat too ambitious. He tries to tell most of the tragedy, and it is "Salome." There is a vast plenty of detail and the hearer is at times bewildered. Otherwise the work is well fashioned and the orchestration is brilliant and replete with pictorial color.

Bodanzky's Reading Liked.

Mr. Bodanzky had a very fine time with the Brahms symphony. The audience manifestly liked his reading, which was joyfully tempered to the quality of his orchestra. One thought at times of old Lear declaiming on the heath, "Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks," and again of the skipper's version, "Blow, you devil, and you shall have the cock."

Finest is not yet within the vision of this young and burly body of musicians. Vigor abounds and the atmosphere undergoes a joyful disturbance. But of the more delicate nuances of music one yet hears little. Doubtless they will come in good time. Orchestras are not born full grown. Mr. Bodanzky is a conductor of enthusiastic influence and already his orchestra shows improvement in precision and balance. Perhaps

Let's Quartet's Concert.

The Let's Quartet gave the first concert of their third season in Aeolian Hall last evening. The members of the organization are the same as at first, the leader being Hinz Lutz, who was formerly second violinist of the Kniesel Quartet, and his associates, Sander Harter, Joseph Knebel, Ernst and Kreiner, viola, and Gerald Maas, cello.

The programme consisted of Mozart's quartet in F major, No. 590, in the Koelch catalogue, Beethoven's "Allegretto" in G major, No. 112, in the Koelch catalogue, and a quartet, harp, flute and clarinet, which was announced as played for the first time here in the original version.

The programme was arranged with taste and good variety. The Beethoven work was a tower of strength between the classic Mozartian music and the ultra-modern selection from the Parisian Haydn. The third movement of his quartet Beethoven himself thus explained: "Thanksgiving to God after recovery from illness, in the Lydian mode. Rejoicing."

The four Let's players did some of their best work, no doubt, in the Mozart quartet.

They gave it with fine rhythm, correct pitch, precision and clarity. The third movement of his quartet Beethoven himself thus explained: "Thanksgiving to God after recovery from illness, in the Lydian mode. Rejoicing."
